Rebirth

Whyte Bard

"It is time for you to go now."

The Lady spoke to him in a sweet voice.

"So soon?" he answered, "It seems as if I just arrived."

"It always does," she smiled, "But it's time to move on to another life and another body. You'll like this one."

"I hope so. Lubianka was not pleasant..."

"No, it isn't. But, like you folks say, 'that's Life!'"

He laughed, and stood up on the so-green grass.

"Yeah, I guess it is. See you in a while, folks."

The Circle of friends waved at him, wishing him luck and good fortune, and he and the Lady moved off into a misty area.

"Pretty foggy here," he remarked.

"It will clear up soon," she said, and she took his hand.

They walked for a long time, until he saw they were on a quiet street in a small town. It looked like a nice place. Around the corner was a park, and in it, two people, a man and a woman, were sitting on a bench, holding hands. They were deeply in love, and that love shone around them to those with eyes to see.

"These are your parents. They're nobody special, but they're nice people and you'll like them," She said.

"They look like nice folks," he replied. "Anything I need to know before I do this?"

"I'm afraid I can't tell you. Life is one of those things that you just have to experience on your own."

"OK," he said, "I guess You're right, all things considered."

The Lady laughed, and touched him on the forehead.

"Now forget, for a time, until you return to Me."

And he did.
